China, one of the largest emerging market economies, enacted its anti-monopoly law in 2008. This law is a milestone in the history of the development of China's legal system and a significant event in the reform of China's economic system. The implementation of the law will play a significant role in improving the competitive environment and will have important implications. China's anti-monopoly authorities still have a lot of work to do, including supporting legislation and improving the anti-monopoly enforcement agency. In a paper that will be presented at this event, the author Chanqi Wu reviews the course of the drafting and revision of China's anti-monopoly law. He also examines some of its specific articles in more detail, particularly those about state-owned enterprises and administrative monopoly as well as discussing the anti-monopoly enforcement authorities.

Changqi Wu is currently Professor in Industrial Organisation at Beijing University and Vice Dean of the Guanghua School of Management at Beijing University. He obtained his PhD in 1990 at the Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium. His research is concentrated in the area of joint ventures, competition and international expansion, with numerous publications in international journals. He spent a sabbatical at the Kellogg Graduate School of Management, US.
